Teacher can't teach

Editorial

IN BAGUIO EARLIER THIS WEEK, PRESIDENT Macapagal-Arroyo was said to have expressed alarm over the deterioration in English proficiency of public school teachers. "We have to make sure their English is good," the President said as she ordered the release of P500 million for teachers' English training. "Really, English is not proceeding anywhere as fast as Math or Science... It is deteriorating. Something must be wrong with the educational system."

She was right of course, but barely. English proficiency among teachers is deteriorating, but so is Science education and Mathematics too. And it is not just something, but a lot of things that are wrong with our educational system.

The results of the National Achievement Test given in 2004 say it all. In that test, covering English, Math and Science, only 2.1 percent of all high school seniors scored 75 percent or higher. In the Math test, 12.9 percent passed with a grade of at least 75 percent. In English, only 6.6 percent made the grade. And in Science, less than 1 percent (0.7 percent) got a grade of 75 percent or better.

The performance of high school freshmen was even worse. In the 2004 High School Readiness Test, covering the same three subjects, less than 1 percent (0.32 percent) scored 75 percent or better in all three subjects. If the passing mark was lowered to 50 percent, only 7.4 percent of the students would have passed the test.

And how do Filipino students compare with others? The Trends in International Math and Science Survey (TIMSS) conducted in 1999 ranked the Philippines fourth from last among 38 countries that participated in the survey. Five years later, in 2003, the Philippines was No. 41 among the 45 countries that took part in the TIMSS.

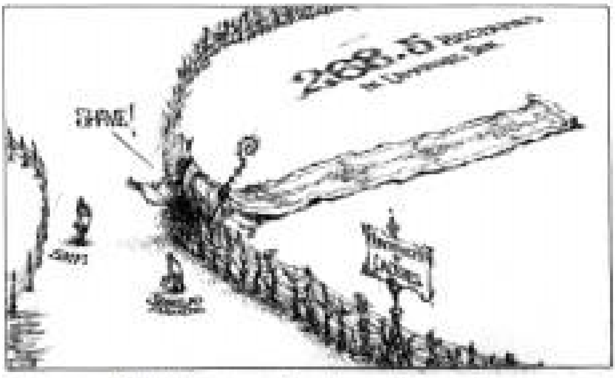

Educators have cited a host of reasons for the dismal state of Philippine education, including the lack of teachers and classrooms as well as the error-filled textbooks and instructional materials. But way up there among the major reasons should be the poor preparation and training of teachers. In a recent assessment test conducted by the Department of Education, only 69 percent of public elementary school teachers passed the English proficiency test. Among secondary school teachers, only one out of every five who took the test had a grade of 75 percent or better.

The problem couldn't get any worse than the situation in the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao. According to a study done by USAID, the English proficiency of many teachers in the ARMM is only as good as the average Grade 3 or 5 pupil in public elementary schools nationwide—meaning they can barely understand, much less speak, the language, given the very poor scores earned even by high school students in the National Achievement Test. The study said the ARMM has "the lowest student academic achievement owing largely to the poor competencies of teachers."

Education Secretary Jesli Lapus is fully aware of the problem, and has no intention of hiding it. Noting that those who took the nationwide English proficiency test were full-fledged teachers, he wondered: "How many thousands of students are affected by this?"

The answer is quite obvious from the results of various achievement or aptitude tests. The lack of English proficiency among teachers particularly is critical in the light of the government policy mandating the use of English as the medium of instruction in three subjects—English, Math and Science—starting in Grade 3 and in all subjects in the secondary school level. If teachers don't even know the language in which they are supposed to communicate with their students, what can they teach?

Lapus has acknowledged that Philippine education is faced with "a myriad of problems." But there is no dearth of sensible proposals to solve them either. Another education summit, like what the President wants held later this month, and another master plan, such as she ordered to be put together, won't improve the competence of our teachers or the quality of education. What is needed is the will and resolve on the part of the administration to commit the resources needed to fix these problems.

BREASTFEEDING

Suzi on how breastfeeding helps moms get back in shape

Breastfeeding helps promote optimal holistic development of the child; its superior nutritional benefits are universally accepted facts. What most don't know are its remarkable "side benefits" especially for working moms.

Suzi Entrata-Abrera, Unang Hirit host and proud mother of three girls Leona (4), Sofia (3) and 15-month-old Nella, attests to the amazing benefits of breastfeeding. That's why despite her busy schedule, Suzi has always made it a point to breastfeed her babies. "It's a challenge to continue breastfeeding while working full time, but it's manageable when you make time for it and plan ahead."

Suzi with youngest daughter Nella

Suzi stresses that eating right helps mommies make the most of their breastfeeding experience. She says her diet helped her maintain a good nutritional status and shape. "When you're pregnant and when you breastfeed, your nutritional requirement is higher, so you have to make sure you're properly nourished."

Nursing moms must also keep themselves physically active to stay healthy. And to make sure they get all the nutrition they need, they should maintain a well-balanced diet and take a maternal milk supplement especially formulated for breastfeeding women. This ensures they get all the vitamins and minerals essential for producing nutrient-rich breastmilk.

Effective weight loss

Suzi says breastfeeding helped her shed extra weight fast. "When you breastfeed you burn about 300 to 500 calories. I breastfed Nella for a year and because I breastfed her that long, I lost extra weight quickly. I'm actually lighter now than when I first started having babies."

More rest and relaxation

Suzi also says, "Breastfeeding mothers get more sleep. You don't have to wash, sterilize milk bottles and even boil warm water to prepare the milk. Breastfeeding is more convenient. Breastmilk is always ready for your baby."

Breastfeeding also has a calming effect. "When you hold your baby so close and feel that you're nourishing and nurturing her, you get this feeling of fulfillment."

The bonding experience

Breastfeeding provides the best bonding experience. Suzi shares, "When we breastfeed, we are compelled to focus our attention on the baby and temporarily forget other distractions. We become more attuned to the needs of our babies."

Helping other moms

For moms who have successfully breastfed, the experience is so positive most become advocates of it. "Support is very important to breastfeeding moms. That's why I really go out of my way to provide encouragement. I'm also very thankful that my husband is very supportive, as well as my mom and my in-laws. It also helps a lot to have very trustworthy and dependable yayas. These are people we can really count on."

For Suzi, the benefits of breastfeeding far outweigh the difficulties. "Breastfeeding is giving your child the best nourishment and discovering a lot about yourself, your baby and the people who care about you. So just keep at it, and continue breastfeeding for as long as you can."

Best bets for the new film season

DEPP: Sings in film version of "Sweeney Todd."

By Nestor U. Torre

AFTER RECENTLY SETTING a record for top-grossing December releases with his new film, "I Am Legend," Will Smith is on a roll. His first starrer for 2008, "Hancock," casts him as a tormented superhero who crash-lands in Brooklyn, and tries to transform himself by courting a housewife (Charlize Theron), causing chaos in the city.

Based on a hit Japanese chiller, "One Missed Call" is about people who receive terrifying cell-phone messages of their own final moments. Though the messages can be deleted, their fatal destiny can't be changed! Ed Burns and Shannyn Sossamon star.

Musical

Can Johnny Depp really sing? As in, really? For the answer to that currently hot question, watch out for "Sweeney Todd," the musical about the "demon barber" who avenges the tragedies and injustices he's suffered by "unmaking" his clients.

Ace director Ridley Scott pegs "American Gangster," with Denzel Washington and Russell Crowe providing high-octane stellar performances. Washington gets special attention in this production because he shifts from his usual heroes to a decidedly villainous role.

The Farrelly brothers' "The Heartbreak Kid" casts Ben Stiller as a man who falls for the "perfect" woman and marries her in a mad rush—only to belatedly discover that she's nothing but trouble! Worse, on their honeymoon, he meets the girl whom he should have married. Michelle Monaghan plays the bride from Hell.

Rise to stardom
